

concise. In most cases the children return home with new supernatural power.

A man brings home food from a feast; his eldest son eats it; the father scolds the boy; the boy stays in bed three days; he leaves and gets to salmon country where he marries the chief's daughter (Nass ARBAE 31:886).

A hungry boy (two brothers) takes some of his father's salmon roe; his father beats him; a stranger urges him to eat all the salmon; he is beaten again; he prays on the beach and (helped by Moon Man) obtains much herring for his father (who becomes a wealthy chief) (Kwakiutl MAM 14:375; Yookilta IS 131; Nootka IS 115).

A boy eats some of the eggs he was sent to gather; his father strikes him; he leaves; he learns to fly and obtains a dance (Kwakiutl IS 162).

Children eat up their mothers' mussels; the children are beaten; they leave and become a new tribe (Nootka IS 119).

A prince gives his hungry slave boy a piece of dried salmon which his mother is saving; the prince is scolded by his mother; he leaves and is taken to Salmon country (Tsimshian ARBAE 31:193).

A woman scolds her husband for giving her step-son too much to eat; the boy leaves; he returns after two years with the power to obtain all sorts of fish (Bella Coola IS 266).

A father invites strangers to eat tallow; his daughters have already been fed the tallow by their grandmother (two girls eat between meals); the girls' mother scratches their cheeks; the two girls leave and marry Mountain Dweller; they return home with huge quantities of food (Tlingit BBAE 39:222, 280).

47. The Practical Joker

Man on visit to friend learns he is out fishing
Man pretends to be fish and friend fishes him up
Friend much frightened

Two men were friends. Just before they parted one said to the other, "When I die you can take my gun." "Good," answered his friend. Then the second got to thinking about having the gun and came to the conclusion, "I may as well get the gun. He gave it to me anyway just as if it were mine."

He went to his friend's house and inquired of his wife, "Where is my friend?" "He's gone. He went to the river to fish." "I'll go after him."

He went to the river and saw his friend fishing. He was so engrossed he did not see his friend as he approached, so the latter decided to play a trick. He undressed and went into the water. The shore was steep where the man was fishing. His friend dived and swam under the water. The current was swift and when the fisherman threw in his line it went far downstream. The friend went up to it and took hold of it. The fisherman pulled and thought he had a bite. He pulled and saw he was fishing up a person. He was so frightened he did not know what he was doing but kept pulling, meantime walking backwards.

The catch came ashore and followed the line. The fisherman was so frightened he did not recognize his friend, nor did he stop pulling. Finally the friend said, "What's the matter with you? Don't you know what you're doing?"

Then his friend recognized him and they had a big laugh.

A similar joke is played in a tale of the Comox:

Two young men come upon their grandfather in heaven fishing; they turn into salmon which their grandfather harpoons; they resume their true form and laugh at their joke before stating their actual errand (IS 66).

In Thompson myths the Transformers play the trick in fish disguise on Cannibal:

Cannibal is out spearing fish; one of the Transformer brothers pretends to be a fish; Cannibal spears him; the Transformer swims away with Cannibal's spearhead; Cannibal sulks; the Transformers return the spearhead to Cannibal's delight; he feeds them much food in little (MAM 12:221, 315; MAFLS 6:43).

In a Haida story the assumption of the fish disguise is used in a display of supernatural power, rather than in a practical joke.

A chief's son enters his silver salmon skin and steals Master Hopper's spear point; he returns the spear point (BBAE 29:267 and cp. this work tale 1).
